There is plenty public scrutiny of professional athletes when it comes to behavior both on and off the field. Lavish incomes, coupled with a job that expects players to manage and play through the pain, have put the spotlight on the NFL and their current player drug policy. Does it go too far or not far enough?

QUESTION: What is bad faith and how can I determine if my denial is in bad faith?

ANSWER: Bad faith is a fraudulent deception and intentional refusal to perform a duty as agreed to in a contractual obligation.

Bad faith insurance denials usually occur when a carrier appears to demonstrate they are trying to unreasonably delay or wrongfully deny a legitimate claim to insurance benefits. Delaying, procrastinating in paying, and failing to fairly investigate a claim are examples of bad faith. Often, bad faith cannot be established because policyholders give their insurer another chance to get their claim right. This usually happens with the offer of an appeal to the claimant by the carrier. When insurers offer an appeal, it allows more time for the insurer to hold on to the benefits a claimant rightfully deserves. Any time a policyholder thinks he or she is wrongfully denied a legitimate claim, it's important to get help from a top disability insurance lawyer.
